This large, classical composition by the Tirolean-born Joseph Anton Koch belongs to a group of ideal landscapes produced during the artist's first stay in Rome, from 1795 to 1812. Clearly, he made such finished drawings as autonomous works for sale in the same way that he made landscape paintings. A relatively small number survive, typically on large sheets around 540 x 750 mm. The drawing media is standard throughout the series, tones of brown and grey ink on off-white or tan paper, extensively heightened with white and coloured gouache. They are often signed 'Coch' in a bid to Italicise his Germanic name. Indeed, the whole premise of his work in Rome was to drive further into the neo-classicism that had emerged a generation earlier with William Hamilton Mortimer, Henri Füssli, and Angelika Kauffman.

Our drawing depicts the meeting of Jacob and Rachel, an episode from Genesis (Ch. 29, vs. 10). As he reaches the country of his uncle Laban, Jacob meets Laban's daughter, Rachel, and opens the stone covering of a well so that she may water her sheep. Koch captures the pivotal moment of the story, when Jacob sees his future wife for the first time. A freely drawn sketch in the Kupferstichkabinett der Akademie der bildenden Künste, Vienna, may be considered as a preparatory study for the present work, blocking out the main elements of the design. Koch's ideal landscapes invariably show biblical or historical subjects within expansive, classically inspired settings, in the tradition of Claude Lorrain or Nicolas Poussin, whose engravings were a major source of inspiration for him.

Dr Giulia Bartrum has examined the drawing in person and confirmed its authenticity. She will be including it in a forthcoming article she is preparing on Koch's large landscape drawings.
